Thank you for the opportunity to address the Third World Intelligence Seminar. Having attended only about two hours of the Seminar, I am in no position to make an overall evaluation of its usefulness. I do, however, have some comments on that portion of the Seminar. Specifically, it seems to me that complex issues are best addressed in either of two ways: (1) By means of a round-table discussion of experts from different parts of the government and the private sector (State Department has used this format frequently, with considerable success); (2) By means of individual lectures to high-level Intelligence Community officials.

Unfortunately, the late afternoon sessions I attended involved neither of these formulae, and consequently, the purpose of the presentations was not clear.

	the round-table approach, with experts supplemented by a few higher level	officials with interest in the topic.
